Across the Andes

The following account of a trip from Valparaiso, Chili, on the West coast of South America, to Buenos Ayres on the East coast of South America, was written by Mr. R. V. Winders, one of the party who made the trip.

Shortly after the baggage mules had been packed, the passengers mounted their mules and set off ahead of the pack mules in single file with a Madria or mace with a bell round its neck leading in front. It was pitch dark when we started the object of starting so early was to give us ample time to get over the Cumbre and also allow for any time that might be lost by accident, such as difficulties in getting across rivers and passengers being taken with mountain sickness.

As day was breaking we could see we were not very far from snow, and about 7 o'clock I tread on the first snow I had seen for ten years. We were now at an altitude of about 8000 ft. and still had another 8240 feet to climb. After ascending for another couple of hours or so, we began to get into snow so deep that our feet were trailing in it as we sat in the saddle. At the first Casucha, we rested awhile. These Casuchas are small round towers with steps outside to reach the floor which is raised some feet above the ground on account of the snow drifts. I do not know how many there are. Professor Darwin says, "there are eight of them, and that under the Spanish Government they were kept during the winter well stored with food and charcoal." He goes on to say, "that they only answer the purpose of caves or dungeons." Of course Darwin made this journey 75 years ago, and these landmarks are just the same, but they are now used again as originally by the mail carriers in the closed season, so that in case of a sudden storm they have food and shelter until the storm is over, and then they make a dash for the next casucha and so on until they get out of the fastnesses of these snow-bound regions.

An ordeal we had to go through here, on account of the extreme cold we were approaching and the still colder we should experience later on, was that two of the Arreros, one with a bundle of linen rags and the other with a jar of vaseline went to the head of the mule train, the one with the vaseline giving each passenger a lump about the size of a walnut, which had to be rubbed on the face; and the other, with a bandages to put over the face and neck with just two holes cut in to see through. We then put on either smoked or blue spectacles with which we had provided ourselves with before leaving Valparaiso. The object of this was to protect our faces as on account of our coming from a hot country, and being transported so quickly into such cold latitudes, we should have had all the skin peeled off our faces, and have felt far worse than one does after a few days at the seaside in hot weather. The spectacles were, of course, to protect our eyes from the sun's reflection on the snow. I could not help but laugh when each had got his face masked: we looked some band of night riders.

Setting off again we had not gone far when we had to cross a creek which was completely covered with frozen snow, the position of which was known only to the guides, and to test the strength of the snow, the guides sent the heaviest pack mule they had across first. The mule managed to get one foot through the ice, but retrieved himself, and finally landed across in safety. As I rode over this place I could hear the water rushing down like a regular torrent. I do not know where a man would have come out if he had gone through; probably a few thousand feet lower down. From here we commenced the ascent of a very steep part, and on arriving at the top, we found ourselves on a flat plain. Here we dismounted to rest our mules, and to get something to eat and drink, having brought provisions with us from Junca.

I had almost forgotten to mention that each passenger was advised at Junca to take a quart of Panama wine with him for his own safety, but no spirits, which have a very bad effect on anyone going through these cold parts.

Mountain sickness is very much the same as sea sickness. When we felt ourselves going dizzy we took a pill at our flasks, but with all these precautions there were five passengers who collapsed, and who had to be dragged the rest of the journey on improvised sleds by the muleteers. This, of course, now made our progress very much slower, which I have no doubt scared the mules admirably, as the atmosphere was getting more rarefied, which made breathing rather difficult for ourselves, and more so for the mules we were riding. We had not been travelling very long in this manner when on approaching the last casucha we saw some people who came running to-

Rev. C. N. Huestis

Lectures on the Lord's Day Alliance

On Thursday evening of last week, Rev. C. N. Huestis gave an interesting and instructive address on the work of the Lord's Day Alliance. He pointed out that the purpose of the Lord's Day Act was to secure for every body one rest day in seven. He stated that at a recent convention at San Francisco the outstanding feature was a paper read by an actress pleading on behalf of the Actor's Union that Sunday be preserved for them as a day of rest.

The work of the Lord's Day Alliance is to instruct the people as to the purpose and benefits of the Sunday Law, and to point out how the Day of Rest can be best used for the development of manhood or womanhood.

As to the observance of the Lord's Day Act the method used both by the Alliance and the Attorney General is that of persuasion. The law is invoked only as a last resort. He stated that the Attorney General had expressed his intention of prosecuting in every case of Sunday threshing brought to his notice.

ward us shouting and gesticulating and lifting their hands, thanking heaven for our appearance. On coming up to them we found that they were a family which had been deserted by their guides. As we had no spare mules with us, we were forced to leave them as we were nearing the most hazardous and dangerous part of our trip. We left them without food and wine we had to spare with the promise that on our arrival at Las Cuevas on the Argentine side, mules would be sent up to them. The story we heard from them was that they were a German Swiss family consisting of father, mother, 2 son and a daughter, and had been settled on a farm in Corrientes, Argentina, but owing to the plague of locusts for the preceding two or three years, had become very much reduced in circumstances, and had decided to go to Chile where the father had relatives in the Aconcagua Valley. Not having means to pay their transport by a respectable company they had arranged with two guides to take them over on foot with two pack mules to carry their few belongings. Unfortunately for them, they paid these men in advance. They started from Las Cuevas and arrived at the foot of the "Vin Crucis" or the zig-zag road, and after proceeding half way up this road, (which took us two hours to go down), within sight of a cañon the guides deserted them. To have gone back would have meant suicide, as they were forty miles from Las Cuevas. So leaving their baggage, the family struggled on and after several hours reached the cañon. The next morning the father and eldest son went down to where they had left their baggage, and brought up a box at a time, a task which they told us took them a week to accomplish. They decided to stay there until some traveller should pass and ask them to advise the authorities either on the Chilean or Argentine side, of their plight, and there they had lived on the few provisions they had with them, and what little food they had found in the cañon for a fortnight. The following day they had not a morsel to eat. On our arrival at Las Cuevas we sent mules to bring them in, and the way they went amongst the Europeans at Las Cuevas with tears in their eyes thinking us for their deliverers, was one of the most pathetic incidents I have ever witnessed.
